Selecting a studio

There are numerous studios and freelance photographers to choose from so how do you do it? Here are a few tips

- Review a number of portfolios and consider their style. Would this studio suit your family and personality?
- What is their professional experience? Is this reflected in the quality of their work?
- Will the photographer put you first? Are they listening to your needs and drawing out your personality? Is this important to you?
- Does the studio convey a level of professionalism that matches your expectations? Consider their testimonials and reputation.

When you select Yve Lavine Photography you can expect a high level of professionalism, friendliness, and eagerness to capture the essence of your day.

Style

Every photographer brings their unique vision. so it's important to see a wide range of samples of work to get the best fit for you and your partner.

At Yve Lavine Photographer we tend toward an editorial candid capture, with less posing and more interaction. That said, group and family photos fall toward the more traditional posed setups and we do recommend ensuring there's a record you incorporate a group portrait session on the day if you have a number of guests.

These as you've probably experienced are the photos we pour over in years to come pointing out nanna, pops, cousin Sue, etc... These are the photos that often become the backbone of the history of our respective families.

Getting Ready

What we find important is knowing in advance which groups are important to be photographed on the day. Let's face it weddings are one of the few times families and friends are all together!

Planning the day beforehand smooths the time along. Having a designated helper, or two, that knows and can identify people at the right time will save you fretting so you can enjoy your special day.

- Create a shot list for us and pass this to your designated helpers. Their job will be to find and direct guests to the photo area so you can both relax.
- Let those on your list know in advance they will be asked to join you for the group photos with the approximate time beforehand.
